

Usability Test Overview

5/4/14

The user's initial impressions of the homepage was that it was too empty and not enough was happening on the homepage.

Creating a new schedule did not give this user any problems. He was able to navigate appropriately and fill out the fields easily.

On the event creation page, the user was fairly confused about the times. He was not sure what exactly he was supposed to put in those boxes. Given his reaction to the datepicker dropdown for the date, having some sort of visual for time may be easier than having users enter their own time. He then attempted to put too many characters in the name box. Having a counter that let the user know how many characters they have left would be helpful. Otherwise there were no issues.

When adding friends, the user suggested making the navigation "more noticeable" because he forgets that it is there. This likely means the text is too dark and blends into the bar. Sending the friend request was easy for this user. When accepting a friend request, the user knew immediately what the number in the navigation bar meant and where to go to accept the friend request. He suggested that making the username of the person requesting friendship more noticeable would improve the usability. Removing a friend was not confusing for this user.